

Scholarship & Bursary Guide

Congratulations! You decided what to study, applied to a great school, and were accepted. Now, how are you going to pay for it?

It's time to find out about the different kinds of financial aid available for First Nations and Aboriginal students in BC. Don't worry if you're not a 'Straight A' student — there's support available for nearly everyone with the desire and determination to get an education. While applying for financial aid can be time-consuming, consider it a good investment in your future!

According to some reports, up to $15 million in scholarships may go unclaimed each year in Canada, simply because no one has applied. Make it your business to take care of your financial future by getting the support you need to continue your education. If you haven't already considered or applied for Band sponsorship, contact your band office or local education coordinator to find out more information.

Two other important places to look for scholarship and bursary opportunities are at your current school and at the school that you will be applying or transferring to. Counsellors and financial aid staff can help you apply for a wide range of scholarships and bursaries, ranging from small awards to large entrance scholarships. Most colleges and universities have financial aid offices with dedicated staff available to help you plan and manage your finances; they will be knowledgeable of scholarships and bursaries specific to your school or program.

Tips for Finding Financial Aid

- Investing time and effort applying for financial aid can pay off! Remember: If you spend one regular work day on your applications and are awarded a $1000 bursary, then that is equal to making $142/hour!
- Be aware of deadlines for applications. Often the beginning and near the end of the semesters are popular times for applications to open and close.
- Update your resume and make sure that your information is current on all your applications. A great resume can make the difference between being accepted or denied so put some time into making sure it's a great reflection of you, your education, your experience, and achievements.
- Each public post-secondary institution now has funding to assist students who have urgent or unforeseen financial needs. Emergency funding is available for food, shelter, medicine, travel or other unanticipated costs.

Scholarships are awarded for high academic performance, leadership, athletic achievements, community service or combination of such. Scholarships don't need to be repaid, and are meant to help fund your education in recognition of your hard work and achievement. Occasionally, financial need is also considered.

Bursaries and Grants are awarded to students who have expressed financial need, though they may also take into account other areas such as community service and academics. Students in unique situations such as those with children or living with a disability may qualify for specialized bursaries. Bursaries also don't need to be repaid and are money in your pocket to help support you in your education.

Student Loans are available to post-secondary students in BC through the Canada Student Loan Program and StudentAid BC. Loans are interest-free while students are enrolled in a program, but must be repaid after graduation. Recent graduates in some professions can have their BC student loans forgiven by agreeing to work at a publicly funded facility in BC and in some cases in an underserviced area of BC. Check with the financial aid office at your school for more information. It's important to pursue student loans with the guidance of a counsellor or advisor.

Connect with and research the websites of the professional college, association, and/or union related to your specific health field of study such as registered nursing, as they may offer support for their students and members.
